Tips to help children recover from the impact of bushfires.

People cope with trauma in different ways and there is no one 'standard' pattern of reaction to the stress of traumatic experiences. Children are not always able to express complex feelings in the same direct way that adults do and therefore do not often show the same reactions to stress as adults.

Reactions to the trauma of the bushfires may result in changes to children's normal behaviour such as:

- Changes in their play, drawing, dreams or spontaneous conversations
- Regressive behaviour – children behaving younger than they normally do
- Nightmares
- Anxiety about sleeping alone
- Trouble getting to sleep
- Irritability or anger
- Tantrums
- Fussy eating
- Withdrawing
- Wanting to stay close to a parent
- Problems concentrating at school

How you can help your children recover:

- Children need comfort, reassurance and support, and to know that they are safe and are being looked after.
- Children are usually very resilient and for most children these reactions will gradually reduce over time with the support of families.
- Try to spend more time with your children and provide them with plenty of cuddles and hugs.
- Sometimes children can better express their feelings through play than through words, so make time to play with them. Let them be more dependent on you for a while.
- Try to re-establish daily routines, for example routines around mealtimes, bedtimes or returning to school where possible.

Find out what your children know. In case they have mistaken ideas or facts about the bushfires, and correct any misconceptions. Keep your responses appropriate to the age of your child and also appropriate to the child's level of understanding and emotional maturity. Young children often need reassurance more than facts.

Listen to your children's concerns. Listen closely to what they are asking or saying, and think about whether they are looking for factual information, or if the questions are expressing anxiety about the bushfires. Try to keep your own feelings to yourself when talking about their feelings. Let them know that you understand how they feel.

Monitor how much your children are being exposed to media stories of the bushfires. Children can become re-traumatised by watching repeated images on the television and it is best to try to shield them from the media.

Be aware of how you talk: Adults need to be conscious of the presence of children when discussing the bushfires. It is a good idea not to let children overhear adult conversations about worrying things if they cannot join in at their own age or stage of development. And most importantly, look after yourself as it is likely that you have also experienced the bushfire trauma. When parents are feeling cared for themselves they are better able to respond to the needs of their children.

Seeking further help. While most children will bounce back after a trauma, some children may show prolonged distress and could benefit from professional assistance. Children who are more at risk of developing more lasting problems are those who have lost family and friends, those who have been seriously injured or witnessed horrific scenes, and those who have developed problems in response to past traumas.

Warning signs of more significant and lasting distress in children include:

 - Continual and aggressive emotional outbursts
 - Serious problems at school
 - Preoccupation with the bushfires
 - Intense anxiety or emotional difficulties

Engage in your own self-care. If relaxation and you have a distant association these days, explore what's on offer in your local community in relation to stress management, relaxation, meditation, yoga and exercise activities.

A qualified mental health professional such as a psychologist or specialised counsellor can help such children and their parents or caregivers to understand and deal with the thoughts, feelings and behaviours associated with the trauma of the bushfires.

Speak to your GP about a referral to a psychologist or contact AWS EAP to make an appointment to see a counsellor.
